Orthodox Rabbis Differ On Use Of Prayer In State Public Schools

A leader of Orthodox Jewry hailed the reversal of the ruling of the United States Supreme Court barring the use of the Regents Prayer in New York State public schools. Rabbi Menachem M. Schneerson, familiarly known as the Lubavitcher Rebbe, upheld the Regents' prayer from the standpoint of Jewish law, says the New York Times, in a detailed analysis published in a letter to a rabbinical periodical.

"From every aspect of Jewish Law, it would appear clear that every Jew to whom the Torah (first five books of the Old Testament) is a guide is dutybound to use every legal and constitutional means to see the majority decision of the Supreme Court on the Regents Prayer reversed," he wrote.

Rabbi Schneerson pointed out that for many children the recitation of the Regents Prayer would offer the only opportunity to make some personal "contact" with God every day. In the light of the attitude toward religion prevailing among some parents, he said, "the hope expressed in some quarters that the banning of the Regents Prayer will somehow be compensated eventually by the introduction of more religion into the home is very doubtful."

The letter also contained what appeared to be a sharp criticism of Jewish groups that have supported the Supreme Court decision.

"With the exception of a small number of secularists and atheists, there is no parent who could in all conscience object to a non-denominational prayer in itself", Rabbi Schneerson wrote.

Since the impression has been formed in the public mind that it is the atheists and secularists who strenuously object to the Regents Prayer, he said, those who identify themselves with the opposition to the prayer "are quite naturally placed in the same camp with the secularists."

His statement recalled a storm of controversy that broke last August when the Jesuit weekly America warned in an editorial that continued pressure by Jewish groups to keep religion out of the public schools might lead to an outbreak of anti-Semitism, says the New York Times. Among the Jewish organizations supporting the Supreme Court decision are the American Jewish Congress, the American Jewish Committee and the Anti-Defamation League of Bnai Brith.

Another leading Orthodox rabbi [illegible] article that the First Amendment defining Church and State separation must be respected if American democracy is to survive.

Rabbi Joseph H. Lookstein, of Congregation Kehilath Jeshurun, 125 E. 85th Street, New York, declared in the fall issue of the quarterly, Jewish Education, that the First Amendment is "one of the sacraments of our democracy", says the New York Herald Tribune. He warns that American Jews will not "stand by passively while others attempt to trifle with it."

Rabbi Lookstein writes: "Our love for democracy is at once idealistic and practical. The idealistic aspect derives from the fact that the roots of democracy are sunk deep in the teaching of our Bible and draw sustenance from them . . .

"There is a practical consideration as well . . . Two millenia of bigotry and persecution to which we have been exposed made us realize that the highest and most effective form of democracy is the one in which there is a clear and absolute separation of Church and State."

Rabbi Lookstein's article is one of the most detailed refutations yet on an editorial which appeared on September 1 in the Jesuit-edited magazine, America. This editorial, addressed to "our Jewish friends," warned of the possible consequences of anti-Semitism because of the Jewish communities' firm stand on secularism.

The majority of the Jewish communities' leaders have upheld this position of separatism in sermons and public statements, but some have urged reappraisal of the Jewish view.

Rabbi Immanuel Jacobovits, of the Fifth Avenue Synagogue, said the Jewish role in "securing and hailing" the Supreme Court decision that outlawed the Regents' prayer might indeed add "to the flames of anti-Semitism." Dr. Michael Wyschogrod, of Hunter College, said the Jewish community is "short-sighted to seek its security in a secularized America."

Rabbi Lookstein challenges the validity of these viewpoints. He said, when asked for comment, that yielding to pressure (and retreating on the Church-State issue) would, in fact, open the way to anti-democratic practices that would curtail religious freedom, says the New York Herald Tribune. In summation, he writes:

"We are convinced that our special brand of Constitutional democracy is greatly responsible for the happy fortunes of our own religious community and of the religious communities that thrive all about us.

"We assert unhesitatingly that the separation of Church and State has been the secret blessing of American and its people. We counsel our brothers of all faiths to treat it as such."

Israeli Official Asks U.S. Help In Integration Of Immigrants

Two leading Israeli officials recently said that the "utmost care" must be given to safeguarding the religious and cultural rights of Jewish and Arabs in Israel. Dr. Golda Meir, Israel's Minister of Social Welfare, and Dr. Shlomo Ben Meir, Deputy Speaker in the Israeli Knesset (Parliament), were interviewed by the New York Times in New York. Both are leaders in Israel's powerful National Religious Party.

Dr. Burg said that one of his country's major problems was the [illegible] economic and social integration. This integration, he said must be "accomplished quickly if Israel is to avoid a class conflict between the newcomers and those who were in Israel long before its establishment as a nation in 1948."

Israel's population numbers about 2,400,000 persons, including more than 150,000 Moslems, and 50,000 Christians. The Jewish population is about equally divided between Orientals and Western European Jews. This almost equal division has been the result of the recent heavy influx of immigrants from Moslem countries.

As a result, Dr. Burg said, the Israeli Government has been faced with the problem of integrating newcomers from diverse economic, cultural, and social backgrounds into what Israeli leaders hope to be a "homogenous democratic society."

It is the Government's hope through its education system to provide a common meeting ground between Western-oriented and Jewish youngsters so that within the next generation there will be "a truly homogenous Israeli people," he said.

Dr. Burg appealed to American Jewish communities to supply American social workers to aid his country to cope with its pressing sociological problems, says the New York Times. In particular, he said that Israel needed experts in such areas as community activities, family case work, and family relief, as well as psychiatric case workers.

Dr. Meir emphasized that although Hebrew was the nation's official and majority language the Arab minority was permitted to use the Arabic language for all official purposes. In the Knesset, he said, representatives of Arab origin deliver their speeches in Arabic.

Dr. Meir also pointed out that Government schools in Arab areas used Arabic as their teaching language. He said that Arab lawyers, in trying cases addressed the court in their native tongue.

He said that Israel's Minister for Religious Affairs maintained special departments, for Moslem, Christian, Druze and Bahaian faiths, and assisted these religious groups in the upkeep of churches and holy places and cemeteries "while observing complete non-intervention in their internal affairs."

Dr. Meir said that Israel's official radio station, Kol Israel, broadcast Moslem prayers and readings of the Koran, and a similar service was granted to the Christian community. Israel, he added, observes more than simple religious tolerance. "It provides the opportunities for minorities to maintain their cultural and religious life unhampered," he said.

Leaders Express Ring Alarm Over Moral Decline, Civic Degradation, Changed Manners, Alcohol, Lack Of Home Life, Delinquency

In an appeal to President Kennedy some months ago to convene a White House meeting of leaders of all faiths, educators and molders of public opinion to deal with public morality, economic fair play, and political honesty which was made by Rabbi Charles Weinberg, president of the Rabbinical Council of America, the largest Orthodox rabbinic body in the U.S., he termed as "disheartening" that church and synagogue membership has risen "phenomenally in the last decade without a corresponding decrease of incidents of moral debasement, civic degradation, and political bribery."

In asserting that the nation's prestige and standing in the world was threatened by what he characterized as a "downward plunge of ethical values in our national order of things," Rabbi Weinberg indicted "those state and Federal officials who violate the ethical responsibilities of trust and honor — who use their authority for purposes of private gain, profit, and influence."

Rabbi Weinberg, religious leader of Congregation Beth Israel, in Malden, Mass., also said that such a White House meeting must grapple with "the crucial issue of peace in a world which is beset with the grave dangers of nuclear destruction and decimation."

The Council's leader appealed to the heads of rabbinical colleges and seminaries to exercise their influence on graduates to assume the posts of rabbis throughout the country to alleviate the serious shortage of leaders, says the New York Times. He was critical of the [illegible] deterred from the pulpit because Jewish communities had "shunted the rabbis from the area of learning, scholarship and study to those of public relations, fund-raising, and counseling."

Rabbi Weinberg declared that the rabbi's historic role must be restored as "an exemplar of the great virtues of spiritual guidance and life, scholarly and literary achievement in advancing the ideals of Torah Judaism."

For religious Jews, the Torah, which includes the Scriptures, Talmud and codes, is the all-embracing document. The Torah is a discipline to which Orthodox Jews are expected to adhere undeviatingly.

Recently a leading British surgeon blamed a breakdown of moral standards for chipping away at advances which medicine is achieving to make people's lives happier and healthier, says the New York Herald Tribune. Alcohol, bad manners, selfishness and carelessness, these are human diseases, bringing tragedy and unhappiness, which doctors are finding it difficult to combat, Dr. Ian Fraser, president of the British Medical Association, told a congress of British doctors in Ireland.

Unlike many diseases, they are avoidable, he added. Reviewing the progress of medicine in the 20th Century — advances which have brought cures for once dreaded diseases — Dr. Fraser said:

"We cannot, however, look back at 1962 with a happy feeling of complacency. We must look at the debit side. A change in the mode of life that is causing great and genuine alarm is the deterioration in morals, manners, and ethics.

"Although this may be a national problem, it has repercussions on the medical profession and it puts obligations on its members that they find difficult to meet.

"Changed manners and morals and the glamor of living dangerously with the exhibitionism that it entails, have again raised the venereal disease rate and are filling our newspapers with reports of gangster attacks and murders.

"There is a decrease in our loyalty to our religious beliefs and with lack of home life delinquency is appearing at an earlier age."

Side by side with the greater leisure time came new sociological and psychiatric problems, Dr. Fraser continued. In a short time, in the United States, man will be working a 20-hour week, he said. Such a state of affairs may not upset the tramp, the philosopher, the beatnik, the monk, the alcoholic, or the professor.

"It will probably affect least the professional, executive and management classes. But the 'compulsive worker' will probably break down. In America many groups of neuroses have been classified . . . these people are all 'leisure-stricken.' They are unable to occupy their leisure.

"For them external resources are not sufficient — such as unlimited playgrounds, television, golf courses, museums, amusements, bobbing, tennis courts. They are not the answer. You can always supply the toys but you cannot supply the play."

Looking ahead, Dr. Fraser predicted a cure would be found for cancer within 25 years. He said:

"If a drug such as penicillin was found to stop the multiplication of bacterial life without altering the normal growth of the cells vital for our existence, surely some sub[illegible] . . . we can see the disease going into reverse for six to twelve months, with apparent cure over that period, gives us the hope that we're on the right lines."

He also forecast that in the future the hospital nurse as she is known today will be a vanished thing of the past, too, says the New York Herald Tribune. "For the future," he said, "it would appear that there will be a small number of highly trained women, probably with a university diploma. Others will be technicians only."

German Chief, Guest In Israel, Admits "Mountain Of Guilt"

Eugen Gerstenmaier, President of the West German Bundestag, said on his visit to Israel that nothing his generation of Germans could do would remove the burden of guilt for Nazism.

In a speech at the Hebrew University, Dr. Gerstenmaier declared that "even the most severe expiation is incapable of hauling away that mountain of guilt", says the New York Times.

His speech was disturbed slightly by occasional hostile cries from a dozen or so young Jews outside the lecture hall. His audience remained hushed and attentive.

The youths carried placards, two of which read, "Both East and West Germany are a continuation of Nazism"; and "Germans are not wanted in this country, not even good ones."

The "good ones" was an allusion to Dr. Gerstenmaier's long opposition to the Nazi regime. In 1934 he was arrested by the secret police and two years later he was officially classified as a political suspect. He was sentenced to several years of forced labor in 1944 for his role in an unsuccessful bomb plot against Hitler.

The 58-year-old visitor, the highest-ranking German public figure to visit Israel, was there for a week as a guest of the Shiluain Corporation, the Israeli company that deals with reparations for Nazi crimes against the Jews.

Dr. Gerstenmaier said that anti-Semitism had become a rarity in Germany and was largely replaced by a "serious and strenuous" pro-Jewish sentiment. Such an attitude, he went on, would be more desirable if it were to be achieved without self-consciousness. This is possible for German youth but not for the older generation, he said.

"The suffering from the burden of guilt which we have to bear is too great to allow unself-consciousness for our generation," he went on, reports the New York Times. "For there are always the old painful questions: How was it possible? How could we permit it? Did we really know nothing about it?"

Dr. Gerstenmaier said that the new Germany had turned away

Soc[illegible] Sees "Protestant" Trend Of Modern Rabbi

Jewish life in America is gradually growing more like that of the Protestant community. One of the chief signs is a trend toward "Protestantization" of the rabbi, a sociologist believes.

Prof. Amitai Etzioni, of the Columbia University faculty, made an extensive study of the Jewish community, including interviews with rabbis and lay members of Jewish groups across the U.S., says the New York Herald Tribune. Dr. Etzioni, in a report on "National Religious Institutions of American Jewry" published in "Judaism," a quarterly Jewish journal, found that "sometimes deliberately, sometimes unwittingly, contemporary rabbis tend to emulate the Protestant minister."

"The traditional Jewish conception of the rabbi is on the decline," he said. "The stress today is not upon the roles of judge, scholar, or teacher of one's 'generation,' but those of preacher, congregational organizer, and administrator."

The modern rabbi tends the sick, counsels the mentally ill, directs those who need relief, and preaches, Dr. Etzioni said. The quality of the sermon has become a major criterion by which congregations elect rabbis and by which rabbis are promoted to more important pulpits and national reputations.

The modern Orthodox rabbi is the least affected, Dr. Etzioni said. Yet he, too, is under various pressures to "adjust" to new situations. Reform and Conservative rabbis are under different kinds of pressures because of different institutional arrangements within their groups, he said.

"Each of them must be a superadministrator in order to run efficiently the various activities, institutions, and associations which make up most modern congregations," he said.

"In addition, each must direct, or at least participate in, a large number of 'social' activities that have little or no religious meaning . . . rabbinical education as often as not rather deliberately prepares its students for the pulpit as it was or ought to be, and so increases the crisis that ensues upon graduating and getting out into the congregational world."

The Heritage Of Boris Schatz, Founder Of The Bezalel Museum In Israel

BY HANNAH PETOK, OF ISRAEL

A retrospective memorial exhibition in honour of Professor Boris Schatz, painter, sculptor, and founder of the Bezalel Museum of Arts and Crafts, in Israel, was opened in Jerusalem. Boris Schatz was born a century ago into a pious Jewish family in a small town in Lithuania. He studied in a Yeshivah in Vilna and, as his artistic talents broke through at an early age, at art school. His interests revolved around Jewish knowledge and history and the representation of Jewish types. By a stroke of good luck and through the encouragement he received from the Jewish sculptor, Godewski, he was able to move to Paris where he began to study sculpture under Antokolsky and to paint in the Cormon studios. Fame came soon. In 1895 he was called to assume the directorship of the Royal Academy of Sofia.

As a creative, and very productive, painter as well as sculptor, Professor Boris Schatz followed the traditional manner which he invested with deeply Jewish religious and national content. In his work there is no trace of any of the many trends of advanced art of his time. It reveals a profound sentiment and powerful appeal to "Jewishness". In those years he created many portraits in oil, plaster, bronze, and other media, of personalities outstanding in Jewish life, as, for instance, of Dr. Theodor Herzl, whom he got to know in 1903, and of N. H. Imber, the author of the national anthem, "Hatikvah".

In 1906 he was able to realize his dream of coming to Eretz Israel where he founded the Bezalel Institute, with the view to awakening and sponsoring Jewish art. Bezalel then consisted of a nucleus of a museum filled with art treasures which he had collected from friends, and of a school for arts and crafts where younguters could take lessons in art and train as wood-carvers and silversmiths.

It was then that Professor Schatz taught his students to execute the fine silver filigree work in Yemenite style and carve little functional and ritualistic objects in olive wood. Their fame has spread in the course of the years all over the world as Bezalel work. Professor Schatz, moreover, invited Jewish artists from abroad to settle in Eretz Israel. His idea, in those early days of pioneering, was to imbue the renascent Jewish people with the idea that art is vital to the human soul, almost as much as the elementary necessities of life.

In the years that followed Boris Schatz undertook several missions abroad in order to collect funds and gain new friends for Bezalel as well as to hold exhibitions of his own works. During the years 1914-1926 he was again active in Jerusalem, continuing to make portraits of famous personalities like Zeev Jabotinsky, Solomon Schechter, Max Nordau, Ahad Haam, Chaim Nachman Bialik, and others. He then also created many deeply sensitive genre works of Jewish content, like "Rachel's Tomb"; a bronze relief, "Near The Wailing Wall"; "The Rabbi's Blessing"; "King Solomon"; "Samson"; and so on. With the years his manner gained in strength, he became sure of himself, and his numerous creations bore the characteristic marks of his gift. He worked ceaselessly and energetically, combining strength of expression with delicacy.

His great dream, as Professor Schatz put it in his autobiography, had been, since his early artistic days, to create a series of sculptures on the life of Moses, for which, unfortunately, he could not do more than collect material. He felt that in having done all he had conceived, he "would know why I have lived and suffered and died".

But, besides his art, Professor Schatz's great achievement was the foundation of the Bezalel Museum, a landmark in the centre of modern Jerusalem. To this day it occupies the same stately building complex in an interesting Turkish-Arabic style. In a few months time, however, the Museum is to move to the new museum compound in the western part of Jerusalem where it will form part of the National Museum, while the School of Art will move into the buildings to be vacated. Since its foundation the Museum has gone through many vicissitudes. It had to be closed down in 1928 owing to lack of funds, but was re-opened in 1935 when the World Zionist Organization took over responsibility for its up-keep. Its treasures have also grown in the course of the years.

During the years 1927-30 and 1930-32 Professor Schatz again undertook missions to the United States for the purpose of enlisting aid for Bezalel, and of holding exhibitions. He died in Denver, Colorado. His son, and daughter, Bezalel, and Zahava Schatz, are working in Israel and are counted among the foremost artists there.

The End Of Misery At One Hundred

One hundred is generally regarded as a most venerable and dignified age. But there was no dignity for Shaul. His case was a shock even to the experienced social workers of the community and of Malben, the Joint Distribution Committee program in Israel for handicapped immigrants.

JDC receives the funds for its welfare services in Israel and 26 other lands from the campaigns of the United Jewish Appeal.

Shaul was born in 1862 and lived all his life in a remote village in North Africa. The majority of the villagers were Jews, and with few exceptions they were all impoverished. Shaul, for one, never learned to read or write, never learned to speak anything but Judaeo-Arabic and [illegible] learned a trade.

His marriage was not successful either, and long ago he had divorced his wife, but not before she had given birth to three sons. He lived with his youngest son, Itzhak, a shoemaker. One day when conditions for Jews in the village worsened, Itzhak decided to emigrate to Israel. Shaul followed his son; the two older sons remained.

Father and son and the son's wife and five children arrived in Israel in the spring of 1962, just in time to celebrate Shaul's 100th birthday on Israeli soil. Shaul again moved in with his son, but Itzhak could hardly make a living for his wife and children since he was only earning $30 a month as a farm laborer. They all lived in a small, two-room wooden house which became more and more dilapidated. Itzhak's wife is only 24; their first child was born when she was only 13. The youngest child is less than a year old.

Learning of the losing struggle being waged by the family, the local welfare agency sent a social worker to see what could be done. She found the old man seated on a blanket on the muddy floor, dirty and crying. Flies were swarming around him. He was almost blind and could hardly walk. The social worker convinced Itzhak to have his father placed with JDC-Malben. Last October Shaul was moved to Malben's Shaar Menashe Old Age Home; a few days later he was transferred to the Pardess Hanna home for the Blind Aged. However, he was still not in the right institution. Not only was he practically blind, but he was also bed-ridden and needed special care.

A few weeks ago Shaul was finally placed in the nursing department of Malben's Neve Avot Old Age Home. He now receives all the help he needs in his daily activities, including washing and dressing. Already his personality has changed. He has found friends and is liked by everybody. And what for him is the biggest step forward, he has started to walk again—holding on to his helper, but walking. For the first time in years, old Shaul has found some joy in life.

Brights FINE CANADIAN Wines
SINCE 1874

At your sabbath table, a decanter of wine is as much at home as a challah.

No wine is more welcome in Jewish homes in Canada than Mazel Tov, a wine made from Concord grapes grown on the sunny slopes of the Niagara Peninsula.

Mazel Tov is ruby red in colour, and richly sweet—but not cloying—to the taste. It's a wine you'll "remember", the kind of wine that you used to taste many years ago.

Mazel Tov, made 'Kosher l'Pesach' under strict rabbinical supervision, is available throughout the year for every 'simcha'.

One Jewish Child In Four Attends Jewish Schools In W. Europe

Despite a definite upward trend, only one of every four Jewish children in Western Europe is getting any sort of formal Jewish education, the education department of the Joint Distribution Committee reported. The number of Jewish children between the ages of six and seventeen in twelve Western European countries, not including Great Britain, was estimated at 118,000.

The report estimates that about 26,700 Jewish children in Western Europe now receive Jewish education in day or supplementary schools. Some 2,500 others get private tutoring or study in seminaries or in ORT vocational training schools. Over 6,000 children attend day schools which devote five to seven hours a week to specific Jewish subjects; the balance attend supplementary schools. The report also notes that enrollment in secondary schools has risen by forty-three per cent since 1959, far above the over-all average.

Advances in Jewish education are reflected in the improvement in teaching methods, in longer stays in Jewish schools, and in better working conditions for the teachers. In addition to the efforts of the communities themselves, financial support is being given by both the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany and by JDC with funds from the United Jewish Appeal. Both groups also provide technical assistance.

Most communities have received Claims Conference grants for schools and for equipment, books, and teachers. In recent years buildings have been constructed or bought in Athens, Rome, Milan, Strasbourg, Paris, and Stockholm. New buildings are going up or being planned in Paris, Brussels, and other cities. In addition, supplementary schools have been set up all over Europe, in rebuilt synagogues, new community centers, and other premises. Claims Conference and JDC grants have often been matched and sometimes surpassed by local contributions.

The small communities, numbering from one to twenty families, pose special problems. Scattered over wide areas, they are unable to provide their children with more than one or two hours of teaching a week. In Holland, Sweden, and Germany, as in Greece, the central community organizations provide these isolated families with itinerant teachers. In addition, a Talmud Torah by correspondence has been developed by Jewish communities in Holland, Italy, and France to supplement instruction by itinerant teachers. The Dutch and Swedish central community organizations arrange week-end reunions for isolated children several times a year. Summer camps which devote part of their day to formal Jewish study also play an important role in Jewish education.

One of the major problems still to be solved is the shortage of qualified teachers. The lack of recognition given to teachers in Europe is held to be an even greater deterrent than the poor salary. Fifty per cent of all Hebrew teachers in the day schools are obliged to supplement their income with work outside the school. Salary scales differ from country to country but even allowing for this difference, the survey shows that teachers in many of the communities are under-paid.

To help solve this problem is one of the objectives of the Commission on Jewish Education, formed by the Standing Conference on European Jewish Community Services last November. The Commission is devoting special attention to the situation in France, where the influx of some 170,000 Jewish refugees from North Africa during the last five or six years has swamped Jewish community facilities, and especially Jewish educational institutions.

Events And Occurrences In Jewish Life In 1962

BY DR. NEHEMIAH ROBINSON, OF NEW YORK, DIRECTOR OF THE INSTITUTE OF JEWISH AFFAIRS, OF THE WORLD JEWISH CONGRESS

What kind of a year was 1962? It was a year which sealed the fate of Algerian Jewry, reducing an old-established, prosperous community of some 130,000 persons to a small, hardly viable group of some 10,000 Jews. It was a year of continued reduction in the number of Jews in Morocco and Tunisia. Conversely, it was a year of a large-scale "invasion" of North African Jews into France increasing the community to some 500,000 and creating a number of extremely serious problems of an economic, and cultural nature.

It was a year of increased anti-Jewish action on the Latin American continent, particularly in Argentina and Uruguay, as well as of intensified neo-Nazi and anti-Semitic manifestations and organization in Great Britain. It was also a year of continued international neo-Nazi and neo-Fascist activity all over the world culminating in the establishment of a World Union of National Socialists, the first post-war organization of this kind intended to cover the whole world.

On the other hand, it was a year in which the U.N. General Assembly finally adopted a unanimous resolution against racial prejudice and national and religious intolerance.

Another international gathering, the Ecumenical Council, on which certain hopes for reduction of still-extant, Catholic, anti-Jewish preachings and teachings were pinned, was adjourned without action in this field.

It was a year of continued punishment, frequently including the death sentence, of a large number of Jews, among others, for economic crimes in the Soviet Union. It was also a year of slackening emigration of Jews from Poland, Rumania, and Hungary.

It was 1962 in which the Eichmann trial finally found its culmination by the execution of one of the worst Nazis, and a time in which the investigation and trials of other German and some other Nazi criminals continued. Unfortunately, the sentences frequently were light and the number of acquittals high. Certain action in this field also started in Austria.

It was a year of extensive negotiations with the Federal Republic of Germany to expand and supplement existing restitution and compensation legislation without, however, any kind of final action.

It was a year of soul-searching within the Jewish communities of the world on the future of Jewry due to the particular circumstance in which the Jewish people has been living since the end of the war. The organization of American Jewry, the cooperation of Jewish organizations, and most of all, the problem of cultural survival was under extensive discussion. In Jerusalem, the first world-wide conference on Jewish education took place.

The exodus of Algerian Jews, which started in smaller numbers before 1962 as the result of the continued struggle of Algeria for independence, was intensified in 1962 and represented one of the major events in Jewish life of the year.

World Jewish Congress officials did their utmost to maintain a semblance of a community structure, but despair descended in the face of O.A.S. violence and Moslem terrorism. There were many fatalities, kidnappings, desecration of synagogues, ransacking of property by Moslems, and also executions by the O.A.S.

The economic position of the Jews became desperate. As a result, the exodus became a flight, accounting at the peak for about 2,000 Jews a day. No more than about 10,000 remain in the country, mainly in the larger cities such as Algiers, Bone, and Constantine, where some security exists.

In Algiers four synagogues and two shochtim (ritual slaughterers of food) are active; two Jewish hospitals are still functioning; and plans have been laid to establish a Jewish school. The Jewish community was officially reestablished at the end of the year.

The immigration of some 100,000 Algerian Jews into France, together with additional thousands from Tunisia and Morocco, caught French Jewry unprepared. Although the Algerian Jews are French nationals and enjoy the same privileges as other French refugees, the need for housing and initial reception alone has taxed all facilities of the French Jewish communal organizations.

Particular difficulties were created by the refugees of Southern Algeria who lived their separate life there and hardly speak any French, and difficulties also arose in connection with the cultural and religious integration of the newcomers. Jews have appeared in cities and towns such as Annecy, Angers, where no Jewish communities ever existed, and therefore no organized Jewish assistance was possible. Some existing Jewish communities have swelled to a never-expected height. For instance, Marseilles Jewish population increased from 12,000 in 1957 to 60,000 in 1962. The Toulouse Jewish population increased from 3,500 to 13,500; Paris from 175,000 to 250,000.

The Jewish position in Tunisia became more or less stabilized after the difficulties following the Bizerte affair. But while on the one hand Jews were appointed to governmental positions, the Tunisian authorities on the other hand disbanded all Jewish youth organizations.

Emigration from Tunisia continued throughout the year, mainly because of economic pressures, in particular the governmental economic development plan which is based on progressive nationalization of all business enterprises or their transformation into cooperatives. Under this plan the Jews, the majority of whom were businessmen, are being deprived of economic possibilities.

The difficulties which Moroccan Jewry encountered in 1962 were more complex. In addition to economic, internal-organizational, cultural, religious, and in part emigration problems, which vexed the Jewish community all year around, there were such purely local occurrences as the forced conversion of Jewish girls to the Moslem religion and of mixed marriages against parental will.

The position of Jews was also complicated by the negative attitude of some members of the government. Opposition papers branded Jews as infidels and objected to the government's permission for emigration. On the other hand, some Jews were appointed to high positions. This met with serious opposition by a number of newspapers.

The internal Jewish situation was aggravated by the fact that no Jewish councils had been elected in Morocco by 1962 despite promises to this effect. But, at the end of the year Jews were comforted by the proclamation of religious freedom.

Emigration from Morocco, a matter of concern to the World Jewish Congress for many years, was one of changing tunes and positions. The Governor of Tangiers stated that Jews were free to go or to stay, and passports were issued in larger localities. At the same time, the office of the Hebrew Immigrant Aid Services (HIAS) was closed by the authorities with charges of being a Zionist agency, providing emigrants with chartered ships and planes, as well as passports. In Casablanca and Rabat some Jews and local officials were arrested on charges of illicit trade in passports.

In the field of education an agreement was reached between the Alliance Israelite and the Moroccan Government regarding Alliance schools, part of which were integrated in 1961. The Alliance claimed that the agreement was satisfactory.

Insofar as the other Arab lands are concerned, Egypt expelled 1,500 Jews of British, French, Italian, and Greek nationality. In Syria, after the break from the United Arab Republic, the Jewish situation was somewhat alleviated, but the Jews were impoverished and the ban on emigration continues. The Lebanese Jewish community continues to dwindle by emigration and only some 5,000 Jews remain, half of them former Syrian Jews. Discrimination in offices and passports exists.

The general position of Soviet Jews remained unchanged in 1962, despite the vigorous protests of Jewish and non-Jewish organizations and statements by representatives of governments against continued discrimination in the cultural and religious field. They were countered, as before, by Soviet statements showing large numbers of Jews in liberal professions, great scholars, musicians, and deputies on the local level.

World attention was focussed on the large number of Jews who were tried and sentenced for smuggling and other economic crimes. Accused persons with Jewish-sounding names were frequently singled out and the proportion of such persons sentenced to death was particularly high. By the end of the year, incomplete figures indicated that fifty Jews were executed and many others were imprisoned.

The year 1962 also witnessed several attacks on the leadership of synagogues and overt actions against Jews and prayerhouses. In June, arson and a bomb explosion occurred in synagogues in Georgia and later twice, in rapid succession, there were attacks against the Great Synagogue in Moscow. No reports concerning the apprehension of those responsible were ever received. The ban on the baking of matzoth in government enterprises and stores was more stringent than ever.

Something new was added in 1962: an anti-Semitic poster appeared in Moscow. It showed a weed, with the head a caricature of a Jew, being uprooted. Next to it was a photo of a Jew, Katz, identified as a person associated with "illegal transactions." The slogan on the poster read: "Parasites, get out of Moscow." The poster also contained attacks on rabbis and synagogues.

Jewish soirées continued, but reports about them were fewer than in the previous years. At the end of the year a professional Yiddish theatrical group was established. A Jewish bookstore, carrying Yiddish books and papers from Poland, Rumania, and the U.S.A., was reported to have opened in Moscow.

The year 1962 was marred by the rash of coordinated anti-Jewish activities in Argentina and Uruguay which led to a number of interventions by the World Jewish Congress and its affiliates. The anti-Jewish manifestations were also considerably increased in Great Britain. On the other side of the ledger was the greater awareness on the part of Jewish organizations of the dangers involved in such incidents and the manifestations of solidarity demonstrated on such occasions.

This awareness was emphasized by the special regional conferences summoned by the World Jewish Congress in Sao Paulo and London. Particularly impressive was the courageous stand taken by the Jews of Argentina and Uruguay, finding best expression in the public protest by Jews of the Argentine during the one-day closing of businesses and schools which was also followed by a considerable part of the non-Jewish population, particularly in Buenos Aires.

The activities of neo-Nazis and neo-Fascists on an international level increased in 1962. Of interest was the appearance of such organizations in far-away places as New Zealand and South Africa, contacts between Argentina and South Africa, and the establishment of the World Union of National Socialists under the leadership of Colin Jordan, of Great Britain, and George Lincoln Rockwell, of the U.S.A. The latter organization was established to coordinate the activities of twenty-four parties in various countries. It stretched out feelers to various overseas countries, and a letter by Rockwell to Argentinian sympathizers was published and submitted to the United Nations by the World Jewish Congress.

There was the "usual" number of anti-Semitic incidents in America and Europe, such as the desecration of cemeteries, anti-Jewish expressions, attacks on synagogues. In the U.S.A. the situation was uneven. In some months, for instance, January, the occurrences were frequent; in others, February, July, August, September, hardly any acts were reported.

The investigation and trial of Nazis and their minions responsible for the murder of Jews during the last war continue on a comparatively large scale in West Germany, with some beginnings made also in Austria. The World Jewish Congress contributes considerably to the investigations by providing witnesses and other evidence.

The reaction to the trials in Germany was often negative and the trials were frequently described as a national shame and disaster. Mostly these trials were simply disregarded. Rare were such expressions as that of the Chairman of the Council of the German Evangelical Church, Kurt Schaerf, who declared that the recognition of German guilt and repentance for the crimes were the only means of national recovery from the German past towards regaining the respect of other nations. Therefore, the trials of Nazis constitute an act of justice. Shame and disaster were the deeds of the past.

The most prominent trials were those of Chelmno (one of the largest death camps, accounting for the murder of 800,000 Jews), Minsk, Cracow, and others.

SOCIOLOGIST SEES "PROTESTANT" TREND OF MODERN RABBI

Once a rabbi is in a pulpit, however, institutional leaders are likely to help him reach the right compromise with his congregation, Dr. Etzioni said.

GERMAN CHIEF, GUEST IN ISRAEL, ADMITS "MOUNTAIN OF GUILT"

from the old fanatical nationalisms to a state "based on the rule of law." He remarked that the youth of Germany today constantly expressed amazement and disbelief anyone could have been "duped by Hitler's rantings."

He observed that the police methods employed in the affair of the magazine Der Spiegel had upset the nation far more than the accusations of treason leveled against the publication. The nationalisms of the past have been replaced by a non-conformism which, he said, was an instinctive reaction to the conformism imposed by Hitler's national socialism.

Dr. Gerstenmaier said he was aware of doubts among his listeners about what he was saying and acknowledged that examples of "stupidity, thoughtlessness, even of evil" could easily be found in Germany today.

But such behavior, he argued, is not typical of the new Germany, although he conceded that his views might represent a subconscious "hope and belief."

Accompanied by his wife, Dr. Gerstenmaier went to Yad Vashem, a shrine dedicated to the 6,000,000 Jews who perished in Europe under Hitler, says the New York Times. He placed a wreath in the stark bare chamber where a flickering flame casts its light on the names of the Nazi extermination camps inscribed in Hebrew and English on the floor.
